

NOTEVAULT, INC. ADDS MANDARIN TRANSLATION FOR CONSTRUCTION REPORTING

San Diego, CA – 22 March, 2011 – NoteVault today announced that it has added Mandarin voice input to its construction reporting platform. Chinese users can now use their native language to speak their field notes, and NoteVault automatically translates and transcribes into English. Daily construction reports are compiled and displayed in English, and are automatically sent out to management and customers to give them unprecedented visibility into events and conditions on the job site. NoteVault also accepts Arabic and Hindi language input for many of its Middle East customers.

“These are massive projects in China and the management teams can sometime span the globe,” says Peter Lasensky, NoteVault’s Founder and CEO, “Allowing these construction teams to speak in their native Chinese tongue gets them comfortable with this new way of reporting. Translating that into English gets management and clients the reporting speed and transparency they need keep abreast of the situation on the ground.”

The NoteVault service fills a huge void in the construction industry by enabling field workers to easily report project activity directly from the field using nothing but their mobile phone. Users simply speak their notes into their mobile phone, which NoteVault converts to text and makes the report available through email or a web-based interface. NoteVault can also integrate data directly into construction project management software solutions.

NoteVault’s hosted solution saves contractors time and money by enabling staff to quickly and easily report from the field, without typing or collecting paper reports. It also gives management real-time project visibility, which can be invaluable in avoiding or prevailing on disputes, wrongful claims or damaging lawsuits.
